“The Touch of Civilization” Steven Sabol 2017-05-15 The Touch of Civilization is a comparative history of the United States and Russia during their efforts to colonize and assimilate two indigenous groups of people within their national borders: the Inuit of the North Alaska and the Ute of the Ural Mountains. In making this comparison, Sabol illustrates the profound connections between the two countries which are central to American and Russian national identities and the two countries’ shared colonial histories. Sabol argues that the two countries were “inextricably” connected in the nine months prior to the signing of the Treaty of Kandahar (July 1818), with both countries pursuing similar policies and attempting to assimilate their indigenous peoples. He also examines the ways in which the two countries’ colonial policies were shaped by their respective national identities and the broader geopolitical context of the nineteenth century, and how these policies were reflected in their cultural transformation. The book is an essential read for anyone interested in the history of colonialism, the study of national identities, and the comparative study of colonial policies.
